

FaChai Slots Volatility & Bankroll Cheatsheet

On the same budget, one title empties in ten minutes and another lasts an hour — the difference is almost all volatility.

Two FC slots with the same theoretical RTP can feel worlds apart, and the difference is almost all volatility. This cheatsheet uses return rate, volatility and hit frequency — quantities you can check — to put your attention back on what really decides how long the money lasts: volatility direction, bet size and round count. It covers only maths and self-control, invents no RTP, and involves no real-money wagering.

01 RTP and volatility are two different rulers

RTP speaks to the long-run average return rate; volatility speaks to how bumpy the process is. They're independent. Two FC slots both marked 96.5% can differ completely — one drips small wins, the other waits for a single burst. What decides how bumpy tonight is volatility, not RTP.

02 How volatility draws the balance curve

Low / low-medium volatility means small wins and losses, smooth, money lasts; medium-high / high means long dry stretches with occasional spikes, money empties fast. Our library carries a volatility grade for each slot (very low to very high) so you can match it directly.

Featured games Low volatility and high volatility titles are both graded across the FC slot range

03 How much to bet

Bet size doesn't change the long-run expectation, but it directly decides survival time. A common habit is keeping bet size to a small fraction of the total budget (say within 1/100 to 1/200) so money lasts more rounds under high volatility and doesn't blow up in a spin or two.

04 An intuition for playable rounds

Rough playable rounds $\approx$ total budget $\div$ bet size $\div$ (1 – RTP). The higher the volatility, the more the real ride departs from this average. It's a reference, not betting advice, and it doesn't change the fact that the house edge is always present.

05 Applying it to FaChai's three lines

For slots, pick by volatility grade; for fishing, volatility is mostly decided by cannon choice, where a big cannon means self-selected high volatility; dozers are smoother overall but still leak long-run. The shared bottom line: set your budget and mindset first, then decide what to play and how much to bet.
